

George Hoberg

Dr. Hoberg, professor in the Faculty of Forestry, is a political scientist by training. He taught public policy and American politics at UBC for 13 years before joining the Faculty of Forestry. His research interests include environmental and natural resource policy, especially energy and forest policy, policy and institutional design, theories of policy change, the role of knowledge in the policy process, and international constraints on domestic policy autonomy. He has written books on environmental policy in the US, toxic substances regulation, and BC forest policy, and edited two books on comparative Canada-US policies and the US influence on Canada.
